Discuss IT Topic: If you had the ability to download memories throughout your life to then one-day review them like a photo album, would you do it? These memories have to be kept on the cloud. This means you are connected and your eyesight would be no different than looking through a camera.

Response: Please make sure all grammar, spelling, indentation, and punctuation is correct.

Personally I would not get the implant of a camera in my retina because it would be an invasion of privacy and would make us feel like we are always being watched. You wouldn't be able to say anything and not expect for it to come back after you. Imagine you were having a private conversation and if you had the camera then it would be uploading to the cloud and could be seen by other people and also like any piece of technology it can be hacked and that video could end up anywhere, all your memories accessible by everyone you know.

If you had a photo album with all your memories, even the bad ones, would you do it? If you think about it the point of us having bad memories so we forget the bad memories and replace them with good ones. If you had them all recorded then it would be a constant reminder if those bad memories, you would never let it go thus never making better ones, and if we did back up our memories, who would want to see all the times they failed at something, every time you did something wrong. You would never be able to have privacy for the rest of your life.

If you do see on the good side imagine people who had traumas and lost heir memory. You could help them remember and get them to themselves again. People who have diseases that don't let them make new memories then the videos would help them catch up and be able to live better every day. Though there are very good things that could make this an amazing thing there are good ones, so this debate is not the easiest to get a real answer to, to be fair its really just up to us, we make our choices and we are the ones who will learn from the mistakes we all make.
