Discuss IT Topic: In today's world of instant gratification through social media, apps, and 24 hr. broadcast news on all day, where do you as an individual take the time to actually form opinions of daily issues that you read about, rather than side with a point of view given to you by your phone, tablet, or television? What is happening here? Do we just allow the exchange of information to be downloaded into your mind, like a picture without rationalizing and instantly reacting to what you see, read or hear? Can you give an example of a moment when you instantly reacted to what you saw on these devices, when in fact it was either false, misguided, or simply wrong? Explain...

Response: Please make sure all grammar, spelling, indentation, and punctuation is correct.

I believe it is good for us to be able to use networks and television for news and important events, for example: warnings for natural disasters, terrorist attacks, etc..... The news helps us get information much quicker and efficiently than ever before. We can get information nowadays in a single click or tap on a device that we carry around everywhere we go. We can access all the knowledge of the world, all of it in our pocket. We download safety reports everyday and we check the weather every day to check if it'll rain so we can be ready with an umbrella in our hands. We can watch, hear, and read news every single day in one shape or form, it'll end up one way or another on your phone.

On the other hand, sometimes websites or the content creators could lie on the information they give and we believe it. News can be one sided and blogs can be all biased for the drama to get more followers. News and information are twisted in front of us every single day, it's just we don't know because we're too busy tapping and clicking for more of it. The sad news is that a lot of people are attracted to drama and problems of other people, therefore giving more power of manipulation to those who said it in the first place. News and information is all around us, good and bad and it's our choice to believe it or not. There is only one question, What if we didn't have this connection of news and information? Would we be better off or With this society would we be lost and just fall apart
